FAQs

Who suits corporate real estate and facilities strategy training, and what does it assume?

Property, facilities, workplace, portfolio, finance, procurement, risk, and sustainability professionals suit the training. It assumes involvement in property or service decisions and excludes introductory maintenance techniques and detailed building engineering.

How does corporate real estate and facilities strategy differ from building maintenance training?

Corporate real estate and facilities strategy aligns portfolios, workplaces, services, costs, risk, and governance with business needs; building maintenance training focuses on technical inspections, repairs, and equipment reliability.

How should corporate real estate portfolios be prioritized?

Corporate portfolios are prioritized through criticality, demand, utilization, tenure, lifecycle condition, cost, risk, sustainability, continuity, and readiness.

What evidence supports workplace and facilities decisions?

Workplace and facilities decisions use occupancy, utilization, service demand, asset, lease, cost, supplier, user-experience, risk, and business-change evidence.

Conclusion

Participants take back a Corporate Real Estate and Facilities Strategy linking demand, occupancy, services, lifecycle choices, vendors, costs, risk, sustainability, and governance. The strategy makes priorities, decision rights, and evidence visible. It supports coordinated property and facilities choices across operational, financial, workplace, and leadership teams.
