Training Methodology:

The course uses a practical and interactive methodology built around real government affairs and advocacy scenarios. Participants will engage in case discussions, group exercises, stakeholder mapping, policy-cycle analysis, lobbying simulations, role plays, and advocacy planning workshops.

The methodology combines Strategic Advocacy Training, Policy Engagement Training, Stakeholder Engagement Training, and Government Decision-Making Training. Participants will apply the concepts directly by creating stakeholder maps, drafting policy messages, preparing meeting briefs, designing engagement plans, and developing a final government affairs action plan. Each session includes discussion, guided practice, feedback, and reflection to help participants transfer the learning to their own organizations.

Course Toolbox:

Please note that tools are not provided as ready-made software. Participants will be introduced to insights, examples, and practical templates relevant to the course, such as:

- Government decision-making map
- Policy cycle framework

What is the difference between advocacy, lobbying, public affairs, and government relations?

Advocacy promotes a policy idea or cause. Lobbying involves direct engagement with officials to influence laws, regulations, or decisions. Public affairs manages the wider external policy environment, while government relations focuses on structured relationships with public institutions and decision-makers.

How This Course is Different from Other Advanced Advocacy & Policy Influencing Courses:

This course goes beyond basic advocacy communication. It focuses on advanced government decision-making, stakeholder power mapping, lobbying strategy, public-private dialogue, ethical influence, and policy impact measurement. Participants do not only learn concepts; they build practical action plans, map real stakeholders, develop policy messages, and assess influence risks.

The course is especially suitable for professionals who need a strategic Government Affairs and Government Relations Training experience that connects advocacy planning with measurable policy outcomes, responsible engagement, and long-term institutional trust.
